“ Uncle Tony always felt like a special institution within our family. He was always helping, always friendly, smiling and kind. In my childhood, which was when I spent more of my time with him, I always found him to be a kind spot in a rough world. He always greeted me with a special, wonderful trill in his voice and seemingly a genuine interest in me. He was always pleasant and right and living up to the best for a man in his family. In our extended family of workers and hunters (he was both) and many rascals competing with each other, he was always something cooler, something better, so confident and clear minded. I remember Tony. Always helping and gentle and congenial and humble and always with great humor and kindness.
